train to go by, walk across the tracks and take another car.

The ride had begun to be less exhilarating.

Perhaps it was good intentions that the roadway at that point was paved with. If so, they were roughly expressed. Man-in-a-Hurry hates even now to recall the joiling he got in the ride up to the main "Huckleberry" line, where the cars that cross the Third avenue bridge run up and down, to and from Fordham, Port Morris, West Farms et al. He hates to revive, too, the memory of his awful state of mind when he was invited once more to step down and out and accept the hospitalities of a third "Huckleberry" car.

That car, in which the last stage of the journey to Third avenue was begun, was full of people before the transfers got on. Afterwards, of course, it was fuller. In the crowd was a baby full of loud lamentations. Altogether the fulness of things was extraordinary. To Man-in-a-Hurry it included that of despair.

But the worst was to come, for the overladen car had barely entered upon the Third avenue bridge when it came to a stop. The draw was opening. A slow tug of giant proportions, had demanded passage down stream and had to get it. The tug eventually got through, but the draw didn't close. Moments fled as moments will. Car after car gathered behind that which bore Man-in-a-Hurry and it was quilte shat in, but the draw still stood wide open. Meanwhile that baby ceased not to lament. Pleasantly humarous passengers began to talk of jumpling over the chasm. Man-in-a-Hurry though desperately of plunging lino it.

Finally, with grouns and puffs and at a rate of speed which would have made a small appear like a fiver in comparison, a New York Central tug came in sight. Soing up stream and pushing a float of freight cars. The mystery of the long wait was solved. In the course of time the float and tug got by and the draw was closed. Not so the chapter of the baoe's lamentations.

When Man-in-a-Hurry at last got to One Hundred and Twenty-ninth street, he had been something over thirty minutes on the way. He s
